Comments
(22% of respondents)

- Overall, the themes were consistent with those observed in 2025, comprising a mix of positive feedback and areas identified for improvement.
- The two most prominent themes this year were culture (25% of comments) and leadership (20%).
- Other themes included resources, communication, technology, remuneration, and the relationship between staff and elected members.

From the Comments | What's going well

The feedback provided by staff highlighted several things that are going well, which can generally be summarised into the following themes.

Strong pride and positivity about working at the Council

In some cases, the feedback received reflected a strong sense of enjoyment in working at CCC, with our people finding their roles fulfilling and appreciating the contribution they make to the city.

Our people are skilled, dedicated professionals who consistently go the extra mile for our city

Staff highlighted in their feedback that the Council has a workforce that is hardworking, highly skilled, and committed to delivering high-quality outcomes even in a complex and demanding local government environment.

We are driven by a desire to make a positive difference for our communities and helping to shape the city

People value knowing their efforts directly support community wellbeing and plays a meaningful role in shaping Christchurch's development. They take satisfaction in seeing the positive impact of their work reflected in the community.

Equity, Inclusion & Community Focus

Many staff acknowledged the positive steps the organisation is taking toward fairness, inclusion, and better reflecting the diverse communities it serves, including recent progress on pay equity and leadership that models respect and care.

We look out for each other

Teams were described as supportive, collaborative, and caring, with managers and colleagues stepping up to help one another during demanding periods or organisational change.

From the Comments | Where we can improve

The feedback provided by some staff suggested areas where we could focus on making improvements, which can generally be summarised into the following themes.

Being great leaders

In some parts of the organisation, our people are looking for more visible leadership (at all levels) to help them feel better supported in their work. This means offering clearer direction and communication, making decisions more consistently, staying connected to the realities staff face, and addressing difficult issues earlier, more proactively, and consistently.

A shared culture of trust and respect

Staff in some areas would like to see us develop a stronger culture where we feel safe, respected, and able to speak up openly. This includes reducing unnecessary oversight, responding to feedback constructively, addressing issues like bullying and performance more consistently, being clearer about resourcing pressures and understanding the impacts they have on staff, and strengthening the support provided to our frontline staff.

Interactions with Elected Members

Some staff would like elected members to contribute to building confidence in the work being done by the organisation, rather than acting in ways that diminish it. Clearer boundaries between governance and operations, along with greater fairness, respect, and professionalism, would help us feel more supported and valued.

Giving value, being valued

In some areas, people want a stronger focus on showing up for each other and our community, including being mindful of how our work and actions impacts others' ability to do their jobs. They also want effort to be acknowledged more consistently and in a way that feels genuine, particularly when people go over and above.

Equipped with the right tools to deliver for our community

In some areas, people would like to see improvements in how technology and tools support their work, ensuring that our systems and technology are reliable, easy to use, and don't create unnecessary pressure. This includes managing change in way that creates less disruption, offering better support as systems change, and ensuring that we have the right tools, and resource in the right places to deliver effectively for our community.

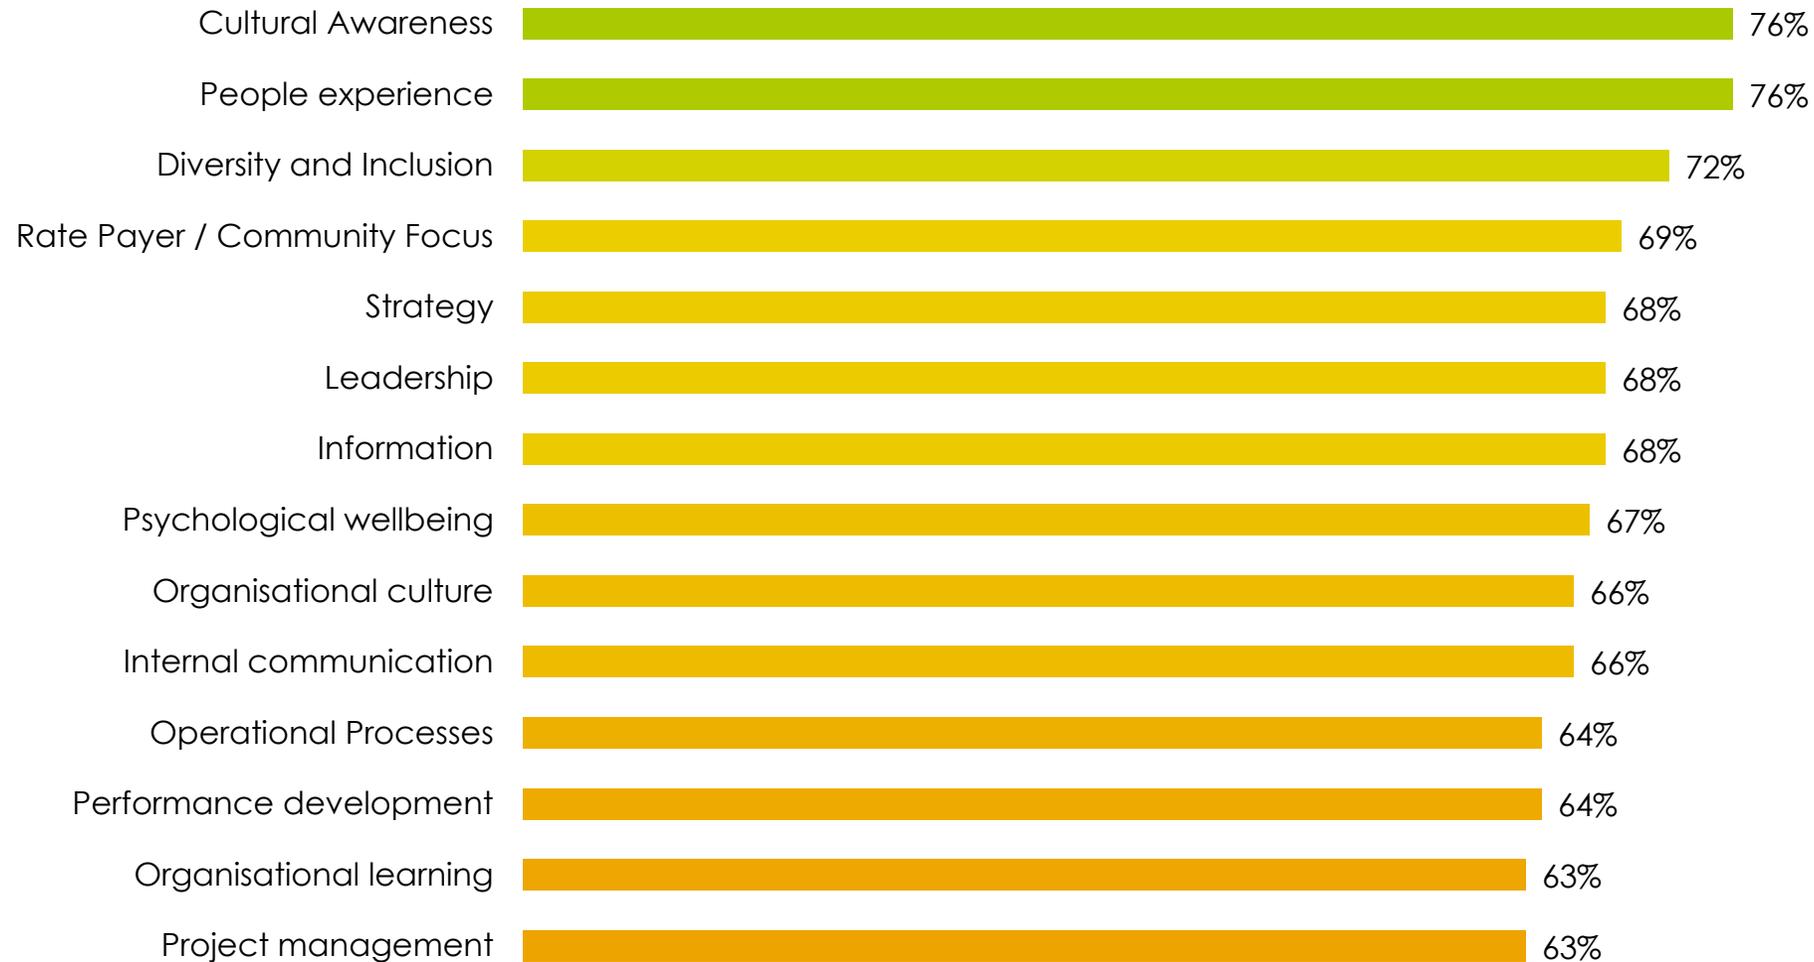

Next steps

- Your General Manager and Head of Service will review the results and insights from your area
- Leaders and teams in your area will work together to identify initiatives and opportunities for the year ahead. All staff will be able to contribute to shaping these initiatives
- We have received consistent feedback that the Working@Council survey format is not a good fit for many of our teams. P&C and ELT will review the survey format and tool, and will identify possible options for 2027.
